

David Shipley

The Quran knife attack is a travesty of justice

We value your privacy

The Spectator and our 5403 technology partners ask you to consent to the use of cookies to store/access and process personal data on your device. This can include the use of unique identifiers and information about your browsing patterns to create the best possible user experience on this website. The following description outlines how your data may be used by us, or by our partners.

Store and/or access information on a device

Personalised advertising and content, advertising and content measurement, audience research and services development

Analytics Storage

Some of our partners process personal data on the basis of legitimate interest. You can object to such processing at any time. Please click "manage cookies" below to view our list of partners and the purposes for which consent is required.

You can change your preferences at any time by using the Manage Cookies link at the bottom of the page.

Manage preferences

Essential cookies only

Accept all

(Image: CPS)

Text settings

Comments

Share

In June we discovered that England has an Islamic blasphemy law, when a court convicted Hamit Coskun for the 'crime' of burning a Quran. Now we've learned that it's even worse. Not only will the law punish you if you offend the institution of Islam, but it will also treat Muslims who respond violently with the lightest of touches. For when Hamit burned that Quran outside the Turkish embassy earlier this year, he was attacked. A man named Moussa Kadri argued